

If we take hurt as a psychological condition distinct from the physical stimulus one receives how does the way civilization or society change given that most people actually never get hurt they just do experience and then adapt as needed

I think in my view it's you go ok, what happened happened someone made a mistake and used force, what's mine to do now is go back and solve the conditions which actually allowed this to happen, so that it never happens again in the process I'll become more capable, confront my own erroneous assumptions, resolve this difficulty, get back to living, and actually address the conditions which gave rise to this thing on the first place. That is in my view a much more productive use of pain than "getting hurt"

And I think it's like people kind of lost the logic of what you're supposed to do with sensation or experience somewhere along the way, but I feel like most of the time when things hurt etc. the logic was like take it figure out what's causing it and then solve it at the deepest level so it doesn't come back again. That's like the dynamic process approach, but the static identity process I think freezes and holds on to it which doesn't do much beyond make you mad, bitter and stuff like that, or just create counter force.

I think ultimately it kind of bridges the material and spiritual by like saying ok what feedback am I getting from the world, what do I need to alter from the inside out. So the stimulus starts outside and comes in and makes an impact, that impact is then allowed to bounce back out as a better person and work pursued to a better system. But it does require letting go of being like that's not my job, why me etc. You just accept it and move forward, which again not to draw a line in the sand but I think is a distinction between people who actually understand struggle and those who don't.

The feedback I'm getting from you isn't the most helpful because you're just letting me walk over you. But I think spiritual conditions I.e. ones psychology is almost the most important thing in helping one to actually be able to do these things but material conditions are important as well I think when we focus on one over the other we lose something important because we treat one as more real than the other when both are equally real

Again I think your feedback is relatively useless. But, material conditions supply us with a given state, friction etc. Our spiritual psychological conditions supply the ability to transmute and experience it. When we do just the former or just the latter the difficulty is that you lose the ability to experience or enjoy things, on the other hand if you find a way to be comfortable even in death, hunger or whatever else you ultimately end up allowing the material conditions to perpetuate and reproduce themselves. I can't say which is better but I think ideally you'd want to be open to experience without letting it dictate your internal sense of bliss and go back when you've ended up somewhere your models tell you is less than ideal.

The truth is that of course the ability to starve or be starved to death with complete bliss and an unshakable core is important and it accepts the truth of life that the Buddha and Jains figured out hundreds of years ago. But that's not really scalable and it leaves the rest of the world in Dukkha. But the ability to actually process life and participate in it, to look at a thing that's happened to you or in general and to say yeah I for some reason maybe my ethics nature whatever feel like that actually distracts from the human experience as I understand it you go and you do something about it. I think people can take what I'm saying as being somewhat callous or indifferent but I say it because I've been abused, raped, and hungry. I've seen true lack in both the material and spiritual sense. And what I'm saying is that like the only way is forward, keep pushing, stay centered and live your life. But getting upset, getting mad, shutting down etc. Do nothing for you other than just remain unaddressed and ultimately affect/infect the decisions you take going forward. All that to say my belief is that one should participate in the world but don't let the world get to you, and when it does go back and solve it out because that's not just good for you it's good for everyone

I think what it ultimately is/boils down to is not a point of logic or even philosophy or any of that it's the accumulated trauma and pain of a life lived without transmuting that pain into order or a higher purpose leaves people crazy, and I think that's really where any of this begins is the insanity of having lived a life that no one could reasonably call easy

And the thing is we have to remember that until very lately the people who built society or spirituality or whatever did not have material or psychological safety yet they built the world, so there's bound to be some errors we can pick up on by just seeing what's happening that maybe shouldn't be. And personally I'm a Welfare Maximizer, but to me that means encountering and eliminate friction and suffering wherever I might happen to come across it, subject to my capabilities and constraints, but even if you just care about yourself reject or are indifferent about the world ultimately we live in an interconnected ecology so caring about the world is caring about yourself and caring about yourself is caring about the world. So ultimately the point is we have to stop fearing pain, suffering etc. because it's only when we accept it that the duality breaks down to all become experience, and until then we can't actually be rid of the idea of othering it, and so long as we other it we can fear it, hold on to it, suffer from it, and become horrified by it. But once the duality breaks down it all becomes a lot easier to just treat pain and suffering with the same detachment that a engineer or a clinician treats a problem, it may sound cold but it's what you do if you actually want to heal and to be a plus unto yourself and the world.